The answer is; it was the old Journal Building, but it was originally built as the city public market, I believe in the late 20s'. It was a market that never became popular. My mother shopped there occasionally in the 1930s' when we first moved to Portland. It had parking inside the building but it was never able to overcome the popularity of the market stalls on Yamhill Street.

A great mistake in my opinion was wiping out the Yamhill 'farmers' market by Urban Renewal. It should have been improved and glorified in some way like the Pike Street Market in Seattle.

Frank Ivancie takes credit for tearing down the Old Journal building. I had a picture of it that I gave to him when I met him at a luncheon a few years ago. It was then that he told me he considered it one of his accomplishments, of which he was very proud.
